and are used in everyday items like computer hard drives, TV screens, and smartphones and in green technologies such as wind turbines. Critical minerals are just as crucial for military applications, including lasers, radar, missile guidance systems, satellites, and aircraft electronics. Currently, the world's supply of these elements comes from only a few countries. There is currently no domestic production. The public impact of University of Alaska research specific to these minerals is significant. This presentation outlined the research underway and the workforce training programs contributing to the development of a critical minerals industry in Alaska. (video timestamp 4:31:45)

Mining Workforce Report: Across the three universities, 44 instructional programs have been identified whose graduates play a key role in the state's mining, extraction, and mineral processing workforce. Over the past ten years, more than 2,300 people have graduated from UA programs important to the mining industry, and these graduates earn an average wage over $104,000 within five years.
